Acquired immune Deficiency Syndrome is a communicable disease caused by the Human Immunodeficiency Virus. HIV is spread mainly through sexual contact between a man and a woman. In addition, around on third of babies born to HIV infected women will be infected at birth or through breast feeding. The risk of transmission of the virus from mother to baby is reduced by antiretroviral drugs. Infection through contact with HIV-infected blood, intravenous drug use and homosexual sex does occur, but constitutes a very small proportion of all infections. Blood transfusion is thoroughly screened and the chances of infections from transfusion are extremely low. People do not develop AIDS as soon as they are infected with HIV. Most experience long period of around five to eight years during which they feel well and remain productive members of families and work forces. In this asymptomatic period, they can pass their infection on the other without realizing that they are HIV infected.

During the asymptomatic period, the virus gradually weakens the infected person's immune system, making it increasingly difficult to fight off other infections. Symptoms start to occur and people develop conditions such as skin rashes, chronic diarrhea, weight loss, fevers, swollen lymph glands and certain cancers. Many of these problems can be prevented or treated effectively. Although these infections can be treated, the underlying HIV infection cannot be cured. Once HIV-infected people have severe infection or cancer (a condition known as symptomatic AIDS), they usually die within 1 to 2 years. The estimated average time from HIV infection to death in Sub Sahar Africa is 6 to 10 years. Many HIV infected people progress to AIDS and death in much shorter periods. Some live for 10 years or more with minimal health problems, but virtually all will eventually die of AIDS. HIV-infected babies generally survive for shorter periods than HIV adults. Many die within two years of birth, and most will die before they turn five. However, a significant number can survive even into their teenage years before they develop AIDS.

No cure for HIV infection is available at present. Any cure, if discovered, may be well unaffordable for most Africans

They drive me along,
 They do they do,
 These my brothers no longer brothers
 Their hands are whips, along they drive me,
 No longer am I the same mother's child
 They push me along,
 Indeed, they do
 These my sisters no longer sisters
 Their mouths are cannons, spittle of fire,
 No longer am I the same father's pride
 They kick me along,
 They do they do,
 These my playmates no longer playmates
 Their actions are fates, my life they decide,
 No longer am I the same free-born human
 They abuse me,
 They do time and again'
 Fellow humans load me with all their bundles
 They are my masters, and me a poor ass,
 To be driven, pushed, kicked and abused
